United and Continental Set Path for Single FAA Operating Certificate

Dear colleague,

I'm pleased to announce that United and Continental have agreed on a path to obtain a single operating certificate (SOC) from the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) for the new airline. A joint team from both airlines has been meeting with the FAA on a regular basis since the announcement of our plans to merge and is developing a structured process in cooperation with the FAA to merge the United and Continental operations under a single operating certificate. This is a long-term process that will follow a series of steps in a transition plan that we will submit to the FAA later this month. SOC marks the third and final stage in our merger integration process, following Closing Day and Customer Day One.

Today, United and Continental each have an air carrier operating certificate and a repair station certificate. In addition, Continental's subsidiary Continental Micronesia has an air carrier operating certificate.

We have decided that the merged airline will retain the legacy Continental operating certificate and the legacy United repair station certificate. This was a technical decision based on a variety of factors. In addition, the Continental Micronesia operation will be combined with Continental's in advance of the integration between the Continental and United operations. This will allow us to avoid delaying the larger, more complicated integration of the United and Continental operations and will simplify some of the later integration steps between the two carriers.

Both the United and Continental certificates contain unique advantages that will be preserved following integration. Ultimately, the Continental operating certificate was selected because of its enhanced technology authorizations and close conformity to standard FAA language, as well as other regulatory and commercial considerations. On the maintenance side, United's repair station certificate enables increased maintenance capabilities, enhanced repair station authorizations and greater maintenance volume.

The decisions about the operating and repair certificates do not affect which operational processes and IT systems are selected. They also do not impact the location of FAA Certificate Management Offices or the FAA personnel assigned to the joint carrier. Currently, the FAA teams assigned to Continental and United are concentrated in Denver, San Francisco and Houston. While the FAA could make some changes to accommodate Chicago and other locations, decisions on how best to locate and resource FAA staff will be made independently by the FAA. We anticipate the combined company will continue to work primarily with the same team of inspectors who will oversee many of the merger and integration activities.

There will be no impact to organization structure, personnel decisions or compensation and benefit packages as a result of today's decisions. In terms of discussions with our represented employees or the merging of seniority lists, the integration of the two airlines is subject to National Mediation Board (NMB) rules and the Railway Labor Act, in a process that is separate from our work toward a single operating certificate.

The transition plan we will submit to the FAA this month, if approved, will allow us to begin to harmonize thousands of technical and operations programs currently in effect at both airlines. As we mentioned in NewsReal previously, it will lay out the integration process within a logical and detailed framework, as well as ensure that both strategic and tactical steps happen in the correct order and that operations are harmonized in the safest possible manner.

The scope of the single operating certificate will include the new airline's specific authorizations, limitations, standards and procedures necessary to ensure safety and regulatory compliance for flight and ground operations. When the programs are harmonized, employees who are affected by a particular program will be trained to ensure they understand how it will function at the combined airline. Finally, implementation of changes will occur in the operation -- with our aircraft, in hangars, in terminal operations, etc. This process is expected to take more than a year. Certain processes and procedures may remain separate or parallel and partitioned for some time even after SOC, pending final integration. These parallel processes are carefully analyzed and agreed upon by the FAA.

One of our main goals in the anticipated merger is to create a seamless network that safely delivers global travel opportunities on one airline. The decisions announced today bring us another step closer to achieving that.

Sincerely,

Michael Quiello,
VP-Corporate Safety, Security, Quality & Environment
